

ARTISTRI SUD

Marisol's Journey

All the women we work with are artisans and have a specific craft, and Marisol's is weaving. It's something she's both good at and passionate about. But it isn't always easy to earn a living doing what your ancestors did for generations, and earning a salary is critical for Marisol and her family. In order to secure a steady paycheck, Marisol had to take a job as a nanny that meant steady (though low) income, but took her away from home for two weeks every month. She wanted to contribute to the household with her own income. Also, she wanted to show her husband that she too could earn an income. But the only jobs that would enable her to do so were away from her family.

Life is full of opportunities, challenges, triumphs, ups and downs. But most of all life and the future are full of unknowns. You never know when your life could completely change. For Marisol, participating in Artistri Sud's ASSET entrepreneurship program in Chile in 2015 was that life-changing moment. Read about how Marisol improved her life.

ICYMI: After Mother's Day, Now What?

Mother's Day is a symbolic celebration of those women who have guided and supported you throughout your life- it does not matter whether the woman you celebrate is your biological mother or not. It is a holiday where we return the support we have received from remarkable women around the world. But why should we relegate the celebration of strong women to a single Sunday in May? Every day we should support mothers.

Ana Amelia Quevedo

Great aunt Lucha, a liberal, intellectual, wise, sensible and generous woman who was born before her time. She inspired me and supported me in every possible way all along my life. During my childhood, she provided me with the kind of literature that somehow shaped my personal values. She was an influential member of the family who stood by me at every event of my life until she passed in 2014.
